Literature:

Paul Hogarth, Arthur Boyd Houghton, London 1975, p.26, no.76.

Houghton was born in India, the son of a captain in the East India Company's marine service. Both his father and older brother were accomplished military draughtsmen and he probably received early training from them. His family returned to England in the early 1850s and he began studies at Leigh's and the Langham Art Society before entering the Royal Academy Schools in 1854. Although he considered his paintings in oils and watercolour to be his most important work, financial concerns made him turn increasingly to illustrating. He became one of the most distinguished illustrators of the mid 19th Century, working for a number of magazines including, The Graphic, Good Words, The Sunday Magazine and others. His most important book illustrations were those for Dalziel's Arabian Nights (1865) and The Adventures of Don Quixote (1866).

The present work was painted c.1866-67 and may have also been known as The Romance of a Crusader. Two medieval lovers are shown walking through a corn field, unaware of the danger of a robed crossbow man who seems about to strike.
